Mr. Aaron Chitwood, of Reynolds county, took his family and went to Washington Territory about a year ago. Last Sunday week he returned fully satisfied with Southeast Missouri, and will make it his home. There's no place like it.

A big blast was set off at Granite Bend, in Wayne county, last Thursday evening. Nearly ten thousand pounds of powder was used used, and the Piedmont Leader says "millions of tons of granite" was displaced. The explosion was like a young earthquake. A miserable brute named Ed. Rolls, living near Palmer, in Washington county, through sheer laziness, permitted his wife to freeze to death during the late cold weather. They lived in a hovel, and so long as the poor woman was able to procure wood for the fire, she and their three children contrived to keep from freezing; but when she was "confined," her vagabond of published War Records naturally dea husband let her and her new-born sire to see the interest of this work, child die of cold! One of the leading subjects of petition to Congress during the present session has been for the introduction of photographic illustrations among the Records of the War of the Rebellion. These prayers have come in by the score; and day after day for many weeks Senators and Representatives have presented them. Though converging from points thousands of miles apart, the burden of their supplication is ever the same. A reader of the current proceedings of Congress might imagine that the question of the war in American politics is that of supplying pictures for the War

Records. The explanation is that these petitions come through the machinery of the Grand Army of the Republic, which has taken an interest in the purchase by the Government of certain photograph plates. Post after post of this organization sends on its memorial, until there appears to be a great uprising on the subject. And it is worth remarking, by the way, how methodcal and machine-like the petitioning of Congress has of late become. It is mostly effected through associations that form net-works of communication throughout the land. Whoever has a subject of legislation in which he is particularly interested needs only to secure the sanction of the central authority or organization, and then a few reams of circulars for signatures sent to the various branch associations, religious, political, financial, or whatever they may be, will quickly flood Congress with urgent memorials.

Rev. Godbey in Farmington.

The wonderful religious revival at pete with her in the markets of the the Southern Methodist church, under the direction of Rev. Godbey, continued much longer than even the most sanguine Christian had anticipated, having been in progress over three weeks. Throughout this time the interest did not abate a single jot; if anything, the audiences grew larger and larger, and the church was packed nightly. Throughout the long hours of the varied services, many who could ship-builders' hammer would sound in not be accommodated with seats stood in the aisles, and did not think of retiring until towards ten o'clock, and others would remain long after this hour. An urgent telegram was received by Rev. Godbey on Tuesday asking him to come to Bonne Terre, and that night the church was so crowded that one could hardly push his way through the dense mass of humanity that thronged the aisles. Rev. Godbey announced that it would be his last meeting with them, and he desired the people to come forward and shake hands with him. A time of general refreshing followed, more converts announced that they had found peace with God, and altogether there was an unusual interest manifested even for this revival. Rev. Godbey was happy. He was loth to part com-pany with them and thus close the services; so, not withstanding his ceclaration earlier in the evening, he determined to stay over another day and hold one more meeting Wednesday evening. The revival closed with 165 converts, 50 of whom united with the Southern Methodist Church. Rev. Godbey left yesterday for Bonne Terre. Rev. Godbey's work here has cerainly been remarkable, view it from
